When you partner with the Missouri Botanical Garden, you support an organization committed to

Education

The Garden's public venues—the Garden, Shaw Nature Reserve, and Sophia M. Sachs Butterfly House—engage more than 95,000 children and support more than 4,000 math and science educators annually.

Conservation

For more than 160 years, the Garden has led comprehensive plant science, global conservation initiatives, and a local focus on sustainable living. We are engaged in critical work to restore ecosystems, slow plant extinction, conduct research to stabilize our global climate, and enlist others to join the effort.

Inspiration

The Garden, Butterfly House, and Nature Reserve invite visitors to experience the wonder and serenity of the natural world. We offer resources for the home gardener, support for green living, and education opportunities for all ages.

Your Partnership Supports

- The description of nearly 200 plants a year, 10% of the total discoveries across the planet—all of these specimens are new to science!
- Collaborations with governments, universities, and conservation groups to implement conservation strategies in places with the most rare or threatened plant species to create benefits for both the local economy and global plant science.
- A global database of plant knowledge including the Garden's 7.5 million specimen herbarium and Tropicos®, the most comprehensive online resource of plant specimens and plant information for researchers and citizen scientists across the world.
- A botanical research program focused on understanding climate change and responding before plants are lost. This knowledge is essential for future growth, as we do not yet know the full value of what we lose when plants disappear.
